Sioux City

IS SITUATED on the Missouri River, at an altitude of 1165 feet. The United States census of 1890 gave it a population of 37,893. The business portion of the city is confined principally to the level lands along the river, while the residences find picturesque locations on the surrounding hills. Transit is afforded by 55 miles of electric street railway. Its situation being commercially central to the richest grain producing region in the world; its manufacturing and commercial industries are naturally those promoted by and connected with agriculture. Its packing houses do a very heavy business, equalled by not more than seven or eight cities in the United States. It has the largest linseed oil mill in the United States; its brick and pottery clays are of the most excellent character, and factories are constantly being added for manufacturing from the raw materials produced. Twelve lines of railway enter the city, and the Missouri is spanned by two bridges, costing upwards of $1,500,000 each. Sioux City is known all over the world as "The Corn Palace City." While gigantic forces have been expended in its building for business purposes, it has more money invested in churches and schools than any city of its size in the country. It is emphatically a good city in which to live and do business.
